

Behavior – Based Interviewing Example Questions

What is Behavior-Based Interviewing (BBI)?

More and more employers are using this interviewing technique. Simply put, behavioral-based interviewing encourages candidates to describe situations in which they have utilized skills and abilities similar to those required in the job for which they are applying. The interviewer asks questions targeted at the behaviors or qualifications they are looking for from an individual who will fill the position.

Why do employers use Behavior-Based Interviewing (BBI)?

Any interviewee can memorize the “correct” answers to a question. Because of this, a better indicator of a future employee’s success is based on the simple premise that past performance is the best predictor of future performance. If a candidate successfully utilized a particular skill in the past, chances are she/he will do so in the future. The more recent and frequent the behavior, the greater the indicator of the candidate’s success on the job. The goal for the employer is to hire candidates that not only have the knowledge and skills required for the job, but also the personal attributes needed to succeed in the position as well as within the organization’s environment and culture.

Steps to Interview Preparation

- Read the job description and highlight the KEYWORDS in the qualifications section
There’s a reason why you feel qualified for this position. But, if the employer doesn’t hear you communicate this, then that’s a problem. The employer has listed these qualifications for a reason – he/she wants to hire someone who meets or exceeds these qualifications. Be ready to share stories/examples of how you’ve demonstrated these qualifications in the past.
- Prepare a list of questions based upon the qualifications
If one of the qualifications is “Strong communication skills,” then the employer will likely ask, “Tell me about a time when you demonstrated strong communication skills.”
- Research the organization, especially their MISSION and VALUES
Most organizations have a website. Read through each section on their site, including organization’s history, products/services, annual report (if applicable). Pay careful attention to their mission and values. Why? Organizations want to hire individuals who are committed to and support their mission and values. Be sure to communicate this in your interview.
- Prepare your STORIES – Situation, Behavior, Outcome (SBO)
Articulate examples which best illustrate what you can do for the employer. Employers will ask questions targeted at the behaviors or qualifications needed for the candidate to be successful within the position. Choose examples from current or previous employment, internships, volunteer activities, class projects, and involvement with on or off-campus organizations. Tell stories with a beginning, middle, and end. Candidates must give the employer enough information for the employer to realize the skills that the candidate utilized in the situation. A complete answer to a behavior-based question has three parts:
  - Situation – what was the situation or problem you were facing?
  - Behavior – what did you do or say? Be specific and give important details. Paint a word picture so the employer can completely understand the scenario.
  - Outcome - what was the result of your actions or behavior?
